

The new Delhi law about street dogs is both promising and uncertain. It recognizes the need to protect citizens while ensuring animals are not harmed. However, enforcement history in similar cases makes many doubt whether real results will follow. For now, people remain cautiously observant. The promise lies in its comprehensive vision. It's not just about population control; it's about managed coexistence, complete with health and feeding protocols. It's an acknowledgment that stray dogs are a part of the urban landscape and require a sophisticated policy response, not just reactive measures. The uncertainty, however, is a heavy cloud hanging over this promise. Delhiites have a long memory of ambitious public welfare schemes that started with great fanfare and fizzled out due to corruption, inefficiency, or a simple lack of sustained effort. Whether it's a cleanliness drive or a new traffic rule, the pattern is often the same. People are therefore conditioned to be skeptical. They are observing closely, looking for tangible signs of change: the arrival of veterinary vans, the organized setup of feeding stations, a responsive helpline. Until these signs appear, their optimism will remain heavily guarded, held in check by years of experience with governmental inertia.
