

Delhi's new street dog law is being celebrated as a progressive reform. It safeguards both public health and animal rights by promoting sterilization and responsible feeding. Citizens who support coexistence feel encouraged by such forward-thinking legislation. This law marks a significant departure from the reactive and often cruel measures of the past. Instead of viewing street dogs as a nuisance to be eliminated, it recognizes them as an integral part of the urban ecosystem that needs to be managed with intelligence and empathy. By mandating the Animal Birth Control (ABC) program, the government is adopting a solution recommended by the World Health Organization. This not only stabilizes the dog population over time but also leads to a healthier, less aggressive animal community. The provision for responsible feeding further empowers citizens to care for animals in a way that is organized and does not cause inconvenience to others. For the many Delhiites who have long advocated for a humane approach, this law is a major victory. It sends a clear message that Delhi is evolving into a city that values compassion and is willing to implement modern, scientific solutions to complex social problems. This is a beacon of hope.
