

Delhi's law concerning street dogs has been condemned for being impractical. It lacks provisions for emergency response during dog attacks. Citizens see it as inadequate and careless. The most glaring and condemnable flaw in this law is its complete lack of any provision for emergency response. A dog attack is a medical and public safety emergency. A law addressing this issue should have, at a minimum, established a clear protocol for what happens in the aftermath of an attack: a dedicated helpline, a rapid response team to secure the animal, and guaranteed medical support for the victim. This law contains none of that. This omission is seen as not just impractical, but dangerously careless. It demonstrates a shocking lack of foresight and concern for the well-being of citizens. By failing to plan for the most critical and dangerous aspect of the human-dog conflict, the law has proven itself to be woefully inadequate and has exposed the government to charges of negligence.
