

The recently passed law on street dogs in Delhi has fueled resentment. People feel the government is more concerned about animals than about human lives. Critics see this as misplaced priorities. This law has touched a raw nerve and fueled a growing resentment among a significant portion of the population. The perception is that the government has bent over backwards to accommodate the demands of animal activists, while turning a deaf ear to the pleas of its human citizens who are suffering from the consequences of the stray dog menace. When people read the law, they see detailed protections for dogs but very little about ensuring the safety of children. This has led to a feeling that the government's priorities are fundamentally misplaced. The state's primary duty, they argue, should be to protect human lives. By passing a law that is seen as prioritizing animal welfare over human safety, the government has created a deep sense of anger and injustice. This resentment is damaging public trust and creating a narrative that the government is out of touch with the concerns of ordinary people.
