

The law on street dogs in Delhi is a step towards making the city safer and more humane. It ensures sterilization, vaccination, and designated feeding areas, which can create harmony between citizens and animals. For many, this feels like a long overdue measure that balances compassion with responsibility. For years, the city has been caught in a cycle of conflict, with tragic incidents of dog bites on one side and cruelty towards animals on the other. This law finally offers a structured, middle-path solution. The emphasis on sterilization is scientifically sound; it is the only proven long-term method to control the population without resorting to violence. Mass vaccination will practically eliminate the threat of rabies, which is the primary driver of fear and aggression towards strays. Furthermore, the concept of designated feeding areas is a masterstroke. It addresses residents' complaints about sanitation and dogs congregating in sensitive spots, while legally protecting the right of compassionate citizens to feed the animals. This is not just a law; it's a blueprint for coexistence. It encourages a culture of shared responsibility, where the government, animal welfare groups, and local communities work together. It's a mature, forward-thinking policy that was desperately needed.
