

The recently passed street dog law in Delhi is being criticized as a failed approach. People argue it will neither control the population effectively nor improve safety. Public disappointment is high. The law is being written off as a complete failure before it has even been fully implemented. The criticism is comprehensive. People believe its chosen method of population control sterilization is doomed to be ineffective due to the scale of the problem and the incompetence of the implementing agencies. They also believe it will fail to improve public safety because it offers no immediate solutions for aggressive dogs and may even protect them. With both of its core objectives seen as unachievable, the law is being judged as a fundamentally failed approach. This has led to high levels of public disappointment. People were hoping for a genuine solution, and they feel they have been given a plan that is guaranteed to fail on all fronts. The sense of being let down by the government is palpable.
