

Delhi's law on street dogs is being celebrated for prioritizing humane methods. It rejects outdated cruel practices in favor of sterilization and care. This has given hope to animal rights advocates across the city. This law represents a monumental victory for animal rights in India. For years, advocates have fought against the brutal, ineffective practices of culling and displacement. This legislation officially buries those outdated methods and replaces them with a policy built on the principles of compassion and science. The law's unequivocal support for the Animal Birth Control (ABC) program, a method centered on sterilization and vaccination, is a game-changer. It shifts the focus from eradication to management, from cruelty to care. This has sent a wave of hope and relief through the animal welfare community. It is the culmination of decades of advocacy, education, and on-the-ground work. They see this law as a promise of a safer, kinder future for the city's most vulnerable inhabitants. It is a legal validation of their life's work and a powerful tool that will help them protect and care for these animals more effectively than ever before.
