

The street dog law passed in Delhi has been described as progressive and fair. It promotes responsibility among citizens while ensuring that strays are treated humanely. For many, this law signals a more compassionate future. The progressive nature of the law is evident in its scientific and forward-looking approach, focusing on prevention through sterilization rather than a cure through removal. The fairness is reflected in its attempt to balance the needs of all parties. It respects the concerns of residents who fear dogs, while also protecting the rights of those who wish to care for them. By laying out clear responsibilities for the government to run the ABC program, for citizens to feed responsibly, and for communities to coexist it fosters a sense of shared ownership of the issue. This is a departure from the old model of blame and conflict. This shift towards collective responsibility and mutual respect is what gives people hope for a more compassionate future. The law is not just a set of rules; it's an ethical statement. It signals that Delhi is moving towards a civic culture where empathy and responsibility are not just ideals, but are actively promoted through public policy.
