

Reactions to the Delhi street dog law have been split. Some welcome it as a step towards safer streets, others worry about misuse against feeders. The controversy reflects deeper disagreements about how humans should coexist with animals. The welcome comes from residents who feel that their right to move freely and safely in their own neighborhoods has been compromised by the growing and sometimes aggressive stray dog population. For them, this law is a necessary assertion of human priority in shared urban spaces. The worry, on the other hand, comes from those who believe in a more inclusive model of coexistence. They fear the law will be used to persecute feeders and create an environment of intolerance towards animals. This fundamental disagreement is at the heart of the controversy. It's a debate about our place in the urban ecosystem. Are cities exclusively for humans, with animals tolerated only as long as they are not inconvenient? Or are they shared spaces where we have a moral responsibility to care for other species? The street dog law has become the battleground for these two opposing worldviews, and its implementation will be seen as a victory for one side over the other.
