

Opinions about the new Delhi street dog law are divided. Animal lovers appreciate that it mandates sterilization and vaccination, while worried parents still feel unsafe letting their children play outside. The law tries to cover both concerns but leaves citizens unsure of its long-term effectiveness. The appreciation from animal welfare circles is genuine; for years, they have advocated for a state-sponsored, humane Animal Birth Control (ABC) program as the only scientific way to manage the stray population. This law codifies that approach, giving it official backing. However, for a parent whose child was recently chased by a pack of dogs, a long-term solution like sterilization offers little immediate comfort. They want action now, not the promise of a smaller, less aggressive dog population in five to ten years. The law doesn't provide clear, immediate remedies for dealing with territorial aggression. It's this disconnect between the long-term vision and the urgent, present-day fears that leaves so many citizens feeling ambivalent. The law is a social experiment on a massive scale, and for now, the city remains a laboratory where the safety of its residents and the welfare of its animals are both variables in a very unpredictable equation.
