

Delhi's new street dog policy has been described as compassionate, practical, and timely. It acknowledges the struggles of citizens and respects the dignity of animals. People hope it will be a lasting solution to a complex issue. This policy hits the trifecta of good governance. It is compassionate in its refusal to harm animals. It is practical in its use of proven, scientific methods to manage the population and reduce risks. It is timely in that it addresses a problem that has reached a critical point in the city. The law's strength lies in its deep understanding of the issue. It acknowledges the very real struggles of citizens who live in fear of dog bites. It also respects the intrinsic dignity of the animals as sentient beings. By giving weight to both these perspectives, it has garnered widespread support. People are not just pleased with the law; they are hopeful. They see it as a well-thought-out, balanced, and sustainable plan that has the potential to be a lasting solution, finally bringing peace to a long-standing and complex urban conflict.