

The street dog regulation in Delhi has triggered backlash. Critics claim it does not prioritize human safety enough, making it unpopular among families already living in fear. People demand stronger measures. The backlash against this law is coming from a place of fear and frustration. Families in many parts of the city feel that they are living under siege, their lives dictated by the presence of aggressive dog packs. They were expecting the government to pass a strong law that would restore a sense of safety to their communities. Instead, they feel the law is weak and overly concerned with animal welfare at the expense of human life. The unpopularity of the regulation is growing, particularly among parents' groups and neighborhood associations. They are demanding stronger measures: the power to have dangerous dogs removed permanently, the creation of dog-free zones, and stricter liability for those who feed strays irresponsibly. The current law is seen as a complete failure to meet these demands, leading to a significant public backlash and a loss of faith in the government's ability to protect its citizens.
