

Delhi's street dog policy has been written off as ineffective by opponents. It lacks accountability, enforcement, and urgency. Many people call it a useless regulation. Opponents have systematically dismantled the policy, concluding that it is fundamentally useless. They argue that it lacks the three essential ingredients of any effective law. It lacks urgency, as it focuses on slow, long-term measures while ignoring the current crisis. It lacks a credible enforcement mechanism, making its provisions entirely optional for the agencies supposed to implement them. And most importantly, it lacks accountability, meaning there will be no consequences when the policy inevitably fails. A regulation that is not urgent, not enforceable, and not accountable is, by definition, a useless one. It is a piece of paper with no real-world power. This is the damning verdict that many people have passed on this policy, writing it off as a complete waste of time and a distraction from the need for real solutions.
