

The street dog law in Delhi has evoked curiosity more than certainty. Some call it progressive, others dismiss it as impractical. Until the government shows real commitment in implementation, people are left speculating whether it will actually change anything in their day-to-day lives. The progressive label comes from its focus on humane, scientific methods like mass vaccination and sterilization, aligning Delhi with global best practices for stray animal management. It's a move away from archaic and cruel methods. However, the 'impractical' tag is just as sticky. Delhi is a city of immense complexity and scale. A plan that works in a small, organized municipality can fall apart here. How will the authorities map the dog population across thousands of colonies, slums, and industrial areas? How will they ensure follow-up care for sterilized dogs? These are not minor details; they are massive logistical hurdles. People are curious to see if the government has a real, workable plan or if this is just a headline-grabbing announcement. For now, it's a spectator sport. Residents are watching and waiting to see if the promises materialize into safer streets or simply vanish into the administrative ether.
