

Delhi's street dog regulation has been welcomed as a humane solution to a pressing problem. It seeks to create safer streets while protecting the dignity of animals. For many, this law represents progress in urban governance. For years, the street dog issue has been a source of constant friction and distress in the city. This regulation offers a clear and humane way forward. Its primary goal is to make streets safer for people, particularly children and the elderly. It achieves this not through violence, but through intelligent management: reducing the population humanely through sterilization and minimizing disease transmission through vaccination. Crucially, the law also upholds the dignity of the animals. It protects them from cruelty and acknowledges their right to exist. This ethical foundation is a sign of true progress in governance. It shows a government that is capable of addressing a pressing public problem without resorting to easy, but cruel, options. It demonstrates a commitment to building a city that is not only efficient and safe, but also just and compassionate. For many citizens, this represents a significant and welcome step forward.
