

The street dog law in Delhi has been described as a disaster in the making. By prioritizing animal welfare over human safety, critics argue it worsens the existing problem. Public anger continues to grow. This isn't just a bad law, critics warn; it's a potential disaster. By legally protecting and sanctioning the presence of a large, unmanaged stray dog population on the streets, the law is seen as actively worsening the problem. It is expected to lead to an increase in dog bite incidents, a rise in human-animal conflict, and a further erosion of the quality of public life. The prioritization of animal welfare is seen as a dangerous and misguided policy choice that will have severe, real-world consequences for public health and safety. The law is not seen as a step towards a solution, but as a step towards a full-blown crisis. As this realization dawns on more people, public anger is growing daily. There is a sense that the city is heading towards a tipping point, and this law is pushing it in the wrong direction.
