

Delhi's recently passed law about street dogs has been criticized as inadequate. It ignores the urgency of immediate safety, focusing instead on long-term sterilization drives. Citizens remain disappointed. The primary criticism leveled against this law is its utter inadequacy in the face of an urgent crisis. While no one denies the theoretical benefits of long-term sterilization, the law's near-exclusive focus on it comes at the cost of addressing immediate safety concerns. Citizens who are currently dealing with aggressive, territorial packs feel the law offers them no tools or support. It's like telling the residents of a burning building to wait for a new fire code to be drafted. The need of the hour is immediate intervention, but the law provides a slow, uncertain, long-term plan. This glaring inadequacy has left people deeply disappointed. They were looking for a life jacket, and the government has handed them a swimming lesson manual. The law fails the most basic test of public policy: it does not solve the most pressing problem that people are facing right now.
