

Delhi's decision to pass a street dog regulation has created both optimism and skepticism. It shows recognition of public safety challenges, yet the practical mechanisms for handling strays are unclear. Some expect positive changes, but others fear bureaucratic delays will undermine progress. The optimism stems from the fact that the government has finally acknowledged the scale of the problem. For years, the issue was left to disorganized efforts by NGOs and RWAs. A formal law provides a framework and, hopefully, a dedicated budget. The skepticism, however, is deeply ingrained in the public's experience with civic agencies. Will the tenders for sterilization programs be awarded transparently? Will the veterinary staff be adequately trained? People have seen grand plans for sanitation, waste management, and pollution control get hopelessly entangled in red tape. They worry that this law will suffer the same fate. The fear is that after an initial media blitz, the program will lose momentum, funds will be mysteriously reallocated, and the city will be back to square one, but this time with a useless law on the books. The divide is between faith in policy and distrust in process.
