

The new Delhi law related to street dogs marks a shift in policy but not necessarily in reality. Supporters call it progressive, skeptics call it impractical. Its success depends entirely on how sincerely authorities carry it forward. The policy shift is undeniable. The government has moved from a position of ad-hoc responses to a formal, documented strategy. This is a progressive step that brings Delhi's approach in line with global standards for humane animal management. Supporters are rightly optimistic about this change in official thinking. However, the skeptics are quick to point out that a change in a document does not automatically translate to a change in reality on the ground. They label the law as impractical, citing the usual constraints: lack of funds, insufficient staff, and bureaucratic inertia. They believe that without a radical overhaul of the civic agencies responsible for implementation, the new policy will have no real impact. This places the entire burden of success on the shoulders of the authorities. If they pursue the law's objectives with sincerity and dedication, they can bridge the gap between policy and reality. If they treat it as just another file to be managed, the skeptics will be proven right, and the law will remain a progressive idea that never left the page.
