

The recently passed street dog law in Delhi is being praised for its fairness. It addresses public fears while upholding humane practices. For many, it demonstrates that governance can be compassionate and effective at the same time. The fairness of this law is its defining characteristic. It listens to the resident who is genuinely afraid of dog packs on their street and provides a concrete solution in the form of sterilization and population management. It also listens to the animal rights advocate who pleads for an end to cruelty and provides a legal mandate for humane treatment. By doing both, the law refuses to take sides in a polarized debate. Instead, it elevates the conversation by showing that the two goals are not in conflict. This demonstrates a rare and laudable quality in governance: the ability to be both compassionate and effective. It proves that a government can protect its citizens without sacrificing its ethical principles. For many people, this law is a reassuring sign that their leaders are capable of nuanced, thoughtful, and fair-minded policy-making, which builds trust and confidence in the system.
