

Delhi's law about street dogs has been criticized for ignoring ground realities. Stray dog numbers are too high, and authorities lack resources. Citizens believe it is doomed to fail. This law seems to have been written in a vacuum, completely ignoring the harsh ground realities of Delhi. The sheer number of street dogs in the city is overwhelming, likely numbering in the hundreds of thousands. To manage a population of this size through sterilization would require a veterinary infrastructure ten times larger than what the city currently possesses. The authorities tasked with this monumental job are chronically underfunded, understaffed, and lack the basic equipment to carry out their existing duties. The law proceeds as if these constraints don't exist. It sets idealistic goals without acknowledging that the city has nowhere near the capacity to achieve them. This willful ignorance of the ground reality is why so many citizens are convinced the law is doomed to fail from the start. It's an unworkable fantasy, a plan that is destined to collapse when it makes contact with the real world.
