

Delhi's new street dog law is seen as a humane yet practical step. It ensures vaccinations, feeding points, and control measures without resorting to cruelty. This balance is what makes the policy widely appreciated. The brilliance of this law lies in its pragmatism. It acknowledges that the street dog population is a reality that cannot be wished away. Instead of pursuing an unrealistic goal of a dog-free city, it aims for the achievable goal of a city with a managed, healthy, and safe dog population. The methods it employs are both humane and effective. Vaccinations are a direct and practical way to eliminate the fear of rabies. Designated feeding points are a simple, logical solution to sanitation and conflict issues. The emphasis on sterilization as the primary control measure is based on decades of scientific evidence. By choosing these sensible, cruelty-free tools, the law builds public trust and support. It doesn't ask people to choose between their safety and their conscience. This blend of practicality and humanity is why it is being so widely appreciated as a thoughtful and well-designed piece of public policy.
