

The law concerning street dogs in Delhi has attracted widespread criticism. Citizens demand stronger, immediate solutions, not vague promises of sterilization. For them, the law is meaningless. The public criticism of this law is both widespread and specific. The demand from the citizenry is clear: they want stronger, more decisive, and immediate solutions to the street dog problem. This could include the power to remove proven dangerous animals from public spaces and the creation of designated dog-free zones for safety. The government has responded not with these concrete measures, but with the vague and long-term promise of sterilization, a solution that has a poor track record and inspires no public confidence. This disconnect between what the people are demanding and what the government is offering has rendered the law meaningless in the eyes of many. It does not address their core concerns, and it does not provide the solutions they are asking for. It is a response to a different, less urgent problem than the one they are facing.
