

Delhi's law concerning street dogs is a welcome development. It brings structure and humanity into stray management, ensuring both safety and dignity. Citizens feel it is an important milestone in urban policy. For a long time, stray dog management in Delhi was a chaotic affair, characterized by sporadic efforts and a lack of clear direction. This law is a welcome development because it brings much-needed structure to this chaos. It provides a clear, official framework for how the city will deal with the issue. Crucially, this structure is built on a foundation of humanity. The law's core tenets are sterilization and vaccination, not culling. It seeks to manage the population while respecting the dignity of the animals. This dual achievement instituting both order and compassion is why citizens see it as a major milestone. It signals a new era in urban policy, where efficiency and empathy are seen as complementary goals. It's a move towards a more organized, humane, and well-governed city.
