

The new law about street dogs in Delhi has sparked anger among residents who face frequent stray attacks. They believe it favors animal rights over human safety, creating frustration rather than relief. The anger is coming from citizens who feel that their fundamental right to safety has been sidelined. They see the law as being heavily influenced by the animal rights lobby, prioritizing the welfare of dogs over the well-being of humans, especially children. The language of the law, with its strong emphasis on humane treatment and anti-relocation clauses, is perceived as a barrier to taking swift action against dangerous animals. Residents in hotspots of dog aggression feel their complaints are being ignored in favor of an ideology that they see as disconnected from the dangerous reality they face. This has led to immense frustration. They were expecting a law that would empower them and prioritize their safety. Instead, they feel they have been given a law that protects the very animals that threaten them. For these residents, the law is not a solution but an insult, a clear message from the government that their safety is a secondary concern.
