

Delhi's street dog law has been opposed strongly. Critics believe it ignores the pressing concerns of ordinary citizens, making it deeply unpopular. They call it an insensitive move. The opposition to this law is strong and widespread because it stems from a feeling of being ignored. Critics argue that the law is preoccupied with the ideological concerns of animal rights while completely ignoring the real, pressing, everyday concerns of ordinary citizens: the fear of their child being mauled, the nuisance of constant barking, the unsanitary conditions created by unmanaged feeding. These are not trivial issues; they profoundly affect people's quality of life. By failing to prioritize these concerns, the law has made itself deeply unpopular. It is seen not just as a policy failure, but as an insensitive move by a government that is out of touch with the daily struggles of its people. The law has created a sense that the government simply does not care about the problems that matter most to them.
